LĀHAINĀ TOWN HISTORY

Home of The Plantation Inn, Lāhainā Town is a lively little port that is one of Maui's top visitor attractions. Favored by Hawai'i's royalty for its climate, location, and surfing, Lāhainā was once home for Kamehameha the Great and the unofficial capitol of the Hawaiian Islands. In the early 1800s, Lāhainā became a major stopping place for the whaling ships of the Pacific. Soon after, the missionaries from America began settling in the town. It did not take long for the staid missionaries and rambunctious seamen to engage in a long-running dispute that occasionally erupted into physical confrontations. Peace finally came when the whaling era ended.

For many years thereafter the prime source of employment for Lāhainā's people was the sugar and pineapple plantations. That has changed with the rise of the visitor industry, which brought about the revitalization of Lāhainā. The town is a windfall for sightseers, history buffs, ocean lovers, shoppers, and fun-seekers in general. Historical points of interest can be easily explored on foot and walking maps are available at the Front Desk.
